VALERIA;

AN ITALIAN TALE.

THERE ſeems to be a prejudice in the world againſt the belief of ſpirits; and yet we forget that the beſt writers both of Greece and Rome, and hiſtorians the moſt famous for their veracity and philoſophy, have atteſted their exiſtence. Plutarch relates, how Brutus, being in his tent at midnight, a ſhort time before the battle of Philippi, ſaw a terrible viſion—"a man of enormous ſize, and hedious countenance, of whom at firſt, he was afraid, but ſeeing that the phantom neither did nor ſaid any thing to him, but merely kept moving round his couch; he at length aſked him who he was? The phantom replied—I am thy evil genius, and you ſhall ſee me near Phil-

[illegible] replied—it is well, I [illegible]

[illegible] ediately the vi[illegible]

[illegible] ppeared. [illegible] near the [illegible] Philippi, the night before the engagement, the [illegible] phantom appeared to him again, without ſaying a word, by which Brutus underſtood that his hour was come!"

Pliny the younger, in his letters, affirms, as a certain fact, the ſtory of the philoſopher, Athenodorus, who, having made purchaſe at Athens of an old manſion, which every one refuſed, becauſe every night a ſpectre there made its appearance, boldly waited to ſee it. It came at length, dragging a maſſy chain, and made ſigns to the philoſopher to follow it. Athenodorus, who was at [illegible] in his turn, [illegible] ceaſing the rattling [illegible] philoſopher, taking his lamp, [illegible] ed it, who, conducting him to the [illegible] which the houſe ſtood, diſappeared ſud[illegible]. Anthenodorus marked the ſpot, to know it again. The day following, he aſſembled the magiſtrates, who ordered the ground to be dug up, and found ſome human bones confined by chains. They were collected, and publicly interred; from which period the houſe was no more diſturbed.

If example more recent be required, we [illegible] conſult the memoirs of the famous Maintenon, d'Aubigny, grandfather of Madame, his rigid ſo notorious for his zeal for [illegible] grity. He had loſt [illegible] kneſs, and inflexible [illegible] ays he, "in my bed, and his mother. "[illegible] hen I heard ſome one enter my [illegible] entirely [illegible] and I perceived at my bed ſide, a woman remarkably pale, whoſe clothes made a noiſe againſt my curtains: theſe ſhe withdrew, ſtooped towards me, and, giving me a kiſs as cold as ice, ſhe, in a moment vaniſhed!"

Shall we then call in queſtion what Plutarch, Pliny, and d'Aubigny have affirmed? or ſhall we ſay, to juſtify our incredulity, that theſe men were weaker than we are?

Without purſuing this diſcuſſion, I am about to relate a fact, which I had from the perſon to whom it happened. This perſon is ſtill alive, at the city of Florence, and will confirm the teſtimony. This is the manner in which I was told this wonderful anecdote.

I was, during an interval of abſence from the ſervice, at a ſmall place in Languedoc, where I was born, when ſeveral friends invited me to ſpend the Chriſtmas in an old Caſtle built in ſome rocks in the midſt of the mountains of Cevennes. The miſtreſs of this mannon had aſſembled ſome young damſels, officers and agreeable neighbors. Good humor and frankneſs prevailed amongſt us all—each had a pleaſure in finding himſelf one of the ſociety; none wiſhed to ſhine excluſive of the reſt, or diſpute whoſe turn it was to hold forth. Each was ſatisfied with the reſt, and the reſt with him. We laughed all the day. In the evening, ſeated in a circle round a large fire, we told tales, ſung ballads, and finiſhed our evenings delightfully. The young ladies of Languedoc, not wanting in imagination (a thing common enough in this country) were particularly delighted with ſtories of ſpirits. Each had his tale to tell. The ſeaſon, the place, the occaſion. [illegible] added to the effect [illegible] ſolemn recitals [illegible] roduced. The [illegible] and dark, the [illegible] ried in ſnow, and [illegible] habitants of the tower in which was aſſembled, anſwered each other through the cracks, by their flow and monotonous cries: add to this, it was the time of advent, when every body knows that apparitions are moſt frequent. Thus, when the tale began, the circle inſenſibly contracted, as it proceeded, it ſtill became leſs, and they who pretended to laugh, were often ready to expire from terror; and it often happened that the reciter was ſeized with a ſudden fit of tremor, his voice changed, he became ſpeechleſs, and ventured not to look either to the bottom of the great hall, whence the noiſe of chains was to proceed; nor yet towards [illegible] from which ſomething was expected the chimney [illegible] to deſcend.

We had in our party a young Italian, named Valeria Orſini, whoſe indifferent [illegible] our phyſicians brought her to Montpellier, to conſult an intimacy with the lady of our Caſtle, who had invited her to the country, during the abſence of Count Orſini, her huſband, who unexpected buſineſs [illegible] obliged to return to Florence. This young ſtranger was very amiable; to great vivacity ſhe united an enchanting ſweetneſs, an evenneſs of temper, which nothing interrupted. Her converſation was lively and impreſſive, though her perſon and features announced nothing but mental deſert. Her large black eyes were very languiſhing, her look inſpired tenderneſs, her beauty and conciliating grace ſeemed to obtain freſh power from the paleneſs which ever marked her countenance. Her lips alſo partook of this paleneſs; for, when Valeria ſpoke, a ſtatue of alabaſter ſeemed to be animated! when ſhe did not ſpeak, ſhe did not the leſs attract attention: and indeed ſhe perſonally gave a ſtriking idea of the ſtory of Pygmalion!

Among all our females, Valeria gave proofs of the greateſt reſolution, in hearing thoſe fearful recitals. She was never agitated, and often ſmiled; and, without appearing to doubt the truth of the tales ſhe heard, ſhe had merely the air of ſuppoſing them eaſy of explanation. The ſtory of a Councellor of Toulouſe, to whom, a man who had been aſſaſſinated, and buried for ſix months, appeared one evening, to reveal his murderers: That alſo of a married man of Lyons, who, having in a tranſport of jealouſy killed his wife, ſaw her every night appear at eleven o'clock, and lie down by his ſide! A multitude of other anecdotes of a ſimilar kind, very well authenticated, but nevertheleſs, very wonderful, ſeemed, to Valeria, as mere common events. We were almoſt angry with her, and we one day expreſſed to her our aſtoniſhment at her not being at all affected by what ſhe heard. Hear her anſwer:

"My friends, it ſeems very reaſonable that any ſtory of apparitions ſhould aſtoniſh you, ſince the greater part of you, perhaps, have never ſeen one?" "You have, then, madam," ſaid I—She ſmiled, with ſeeming contempt. "I have done more," ſhe replied, "I have been, and am ſtill one myſelf! It is a ſpirit who now addreſſes you!" At theſe words all the party uttered a loud ſhriek, and fled from her precipitately; and were, indeed, preſſing towards the door, when Valeria, with that ſweet and tender voice, the tones of which were irreſiſtible, called us back, and entreated us to be ſeated; and, whilſt taking each alternately by the hand, at the ſame time, that we looked upon her with terror, and diſcovered each ſome new appearance in her perſon, which we had never ſeen before, and which favored the other world, ſhe ſpoke as follows:

"It is no fault of mine, my friends, If I have been dead theſe ten years!-----There is no one to whom this might not have happened; but what does not happen quite ſo often is, that ſince that period, I have found myſelf infinitely happier; I have enjoyed a felicity I never knew before, and which, thanks to heaven, ſtill continues. It is true, that the troubles I endured during my life, well paid for the happineſs I enjoyed ſince my death. It is neceſſary that I tell you every thing which happened to me till that fortunate moment, and you will ſee that my death alone could inſure my tranquility in the world!

"I was born at Florence, and my parents were noble and affluent. My father and mother had no child but myſelf. I was brought up beneath their roof, where my good and tender mother compenſated by her care, her love, and her careſſes for the uneaſineſs I ſuffered from the ſeverity of my father. That old man, eſtimable in many reſpects, was proud of his high birth, the honors he had obtained in the ſervice of the emperor, and every day made himſelf miſerable, becauſe he had no ſon to inherit his titles. My poor mother ſuffered his ill humours with a ſweetneſs, which ſometimes diſarmed my father; but vanity ſoon reſumed her empire ---He believed himſelf without a child, becauſe he was without a ſon!

"The palace we inhabited at Florence, was next to the houſe where dwelt a venerable gentleman, not very rich, but highly eſteemed. He was called the Marquis Orſini. A long time a widower, he dedicated his life to the education of Octavius, his only ſon, whoſe age was nearly the ſame as my own.

"My father and the old Orſini had formerly ſerved together; they eſteemed and frequently ſaw each other; and young Orſini was, from his childhood, accuſtomed to come often and familiarly to our houſe; and my mother always took affectionate notice of him.

"I was hardly ten years old, when Octavius became the friend of my heart. He was ſo mild, ſo handſome, and ſo amiable, that I loved him more than ever ſiſter loved a brother, I told him all my pleasures and my troubles, and was the confidant of his secrets; and, as if we had foreseen the sorrows it was to cause us, we took care to conceal our mutual passion. Before my father and mother, we appeared to be indifferent: our amusements seemed to occupy us entirely; sometimes we even disputed, but as soon as we got into the garden, or a little grove at the end of it, we had no longer any restraint.

"Octavius spoke of nothing but his tenderness. He pressed and would kiss my hands; often he ventured to embrace me vowing never to have any wife but Valeria. I, on my part, made a similar vow, and I received his innocent caresses without a blush. 'Till the age of fourteen, no remorse, no fears interrupted our tender passion. Octavius was then sixteen. I perceived that I loved him more than I had ever done any thing before; but a secret whispering told me, that I ought no longer to walk alone in the grove with Octavius. From this moment I avoided such walks; and I took away from him, in our sports that unreserve which had constituted their delight. Octavius made heavy complaints. I wished to tell him my motives, and, with this view, for the last time, I contented to meet him in the solitary grove. But whether my father had any suspicions, or whether chance there directed him he approached us, in a green walk very much shaded, where I was sitting on a bank of turf. There was room [illegible] Octavius was kneeling before me, holding my hands and addressing me with much vivacity; and as he spoke in a low tone, from the fear of our being overheard, our faces in a manner met. In this position my father surprized us; his anger was equal to our terror: he ordered me, in a terrible voice, to go to my mother; I instantly obeyed. I heard him at a great distance reprimanding Octavius—forbidding him ever to enter our doors; and I saw the poor youth retire weeping from our mansion.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE DEATH OF THE COUNTESS CORNELIA BAUDI, OF CESENA;

Who was consumed by a fire kindled in her own body.

THIS lady was in her sixty-second year, and well a day, till night, when she began to be heavy. After supper she was put to bed, and talked three hours with her maid; at last, falling asleep, the door was shut. In the morning, the maid going to call her, saw her corpse in the deplored condition:—Four feet distant from the bed was a heap of ashes, two legs untouched, the stocking on, between which lay the head, the brains, half the back part of the skull, and the whole chin burned to ashes among which were found three fingers blackened. All the rest was ashes; which had this quality, that they left in the hand a greasy and stinking moisture. The air of the room had foot shining in it: a small oil-lamp on the floor was covered with ashes, but no oil in it. Of two candles which were on the table, the tallow was gone, but the cot on left; some moisture about the feet of the candlesticks. The bed, undamaged: the blankets and sheets only raised on one side, as when one gets out of bed. The whole furniture over spread with moist, ash-colored soot; which penetrated the drawers, and fouled the linen. This soot even got into a neighbouring kitchen, hung on its walls and utensils; and a bit of bread, which was covered [illegible] was refused by several dogs. In the room above the same [illegible] soot; and, from the windows, trickled down a greasy, loathsome, yellowish liquor, with an unusual stink. The floor of the chamber was thick smeared with a gluish moisture, not easily got off, and the stink spread into other chambers.

The narration is followed by an inquiry into the cause of this conflagration, the result of which is, that it was not from the lamp, not from a flash of lightening, but from her own body; though some concluded that it must be the effect of a fulmen. The dogs refused the bread because of the sulphureous stink; and nothing but a fulmen could reduce a body to impalable ashes. But, it seems, there was no sulphureous or nitrous smell of fulmen, and the effects of it would not reduce a body to impalable ashes.

FOR THE NEW-YORK WEEKLY MUSEUM.

Mr Hasson,

The following HYMN, composed on the Death of our beloved WASHINGTON, and set to music by a young lady on the day observed for the Solemn Procession in this city, is offered in competition with any thing of the kind on the present melancholy occasion. A E I O U Y.

THE mournful accent of the doleful bell
Bespeaks the solemn echo of his knell.
Ah! WASHINGTON, the Great, is gone!—
His Columbia's cherish'd Son!
Behold him rise in Glory's train,
Superior to the weak domain.

The Gods long pleas'd to crown his days;
Resplendent,—just,—have been his ways.
His charter forever stands
Inviolate on mortal hands.
Now let us sound the trump of Fame,
To WASINGTON's unsullied name.

Behold the HERO! see him rise,
Refulgent thro' the azure skies.
Lo! angels, roll'd in gold array,
Majestic on the milky-way;
And sing heavenly anthems, soft,
Come, come, ye HERO, come aloft.

ON THE FIRST DAY OF A NEW-YEAR.

[illegible] born year! Adieu!
HAIL! [illegible]
Since life's [illegible] noon is past;
The future flies, the present pains,
Spring's pos[illegible] pleases when the snow storm falls;
Yet when the buds shoot forth in smiling May,
And the cool breezes blefs the pleasing day,
We tire with gazing on the infant flowers,
And long for riper hearts and summer show'rs
Bright summer comes, the purple with rose;
The blushing piony and the [illegible] to the noon,
The peach and nectarine harvest will be soon;
And wanting these no more the blooms delight,
We cast the eye to orchards pleasing sight;
No longer flowery orchards please the sight;
We then anticipate rich autumn's store,
And long as much as for the [illegible] before:
We when the fickle [illegible]
And [illegible]
And feel [illegible] cloud with anxious fear,
It comes—the day the last wheat's ripening ear,
The ground yields up its golden store,
What then can happy mortals wish for more?
Not so our [illegible] have with is still behind,
Whether spring calmes or winter spurns the wind:
We long impatient for the precious cloud,
To fatten and prepare the earth new plough'd;
Yet when the blest physician robes in white,
Falls over-thick, we vile our temper quite.
Oh! the poor flocks [illegible] our discontent,
And then we curse what Providence has sent.

Be far from me such ways, let me enjoy
Each in the [illegible] and no care annoy;
In winter frisking in a warm array,
Make [illegible] happy, wanton day;
In spring delight in hearing of the lark,
As I stray careless through the lawn or park:
In summer's heats solace me in the shade,
And warm, like summer, woo some warm-like maid;
In autumn taste with glee, fair autumn's store,
And bless'd in sweet content desire no more;
And as the seasons vary and the times,
Direct me still with exercise and rhymes;
Thus shall each day with pleasure deck my way,
And ev'ry smiling month be sweet as May.

CONTENT.

ON A DRUNKEN OLD WOMAN,

who was accidentally drowned in crossing the Ferry.

MRS. TIPPLE, well nam'd for her love of good stuff,
Who of wine always tipt, yet had never enough,
While crossing a ferry, of course rather drunk,
The boat overset,—to the bottom she sunk.
Though in water she swill'd of a more sober cup,
Yet 'tis said she went down with her spirits quite up;
For her careless departure this reason they give,
That she thought the bliss equal to drink or to live.

CLOWNISH SIMPLICITY.

IN a village in France, an old farmer was dying. The son was dispatched to the Cure to confess him. He remained three hours at the Cure's door, knocking very softly. The door was at length opened by the Cure himself, who asked him, why he had not knocked louder? "I was afraid to waken you," answered the peasant. "What is the business, however, you come about?" said the priest. "My father was dying," replied he, "when I left him four hours ago." "He is by this time certainly dead; and I have no occasion to go to him," said the priest. "Oh no, Sir," replied the fellow, "our neighbor Pierrot promised to keep him alive till you should come."

BON MOT OF THE DEVIL.

A wretched miser in Salamanca being on his death-bed, his infernal majesty dispatched his messenger Moloch to convey his soul to the shades to meet its due reward as soon as it should leave its mortal frame. Moloch, however, returned shortly after, and informed his majesty, that he had found the bed of the miser so encompassed with trustees and executors (for the miser was willing all his wealth to charitable purposes) that he could not get near it. "That is very unfortunate," said the Devil; "the wretch has, it is true, been too cunning for us; but his immense fortune, left for CHARITIES, will insure us all the trustees and executors."

The utility of a Circulating Library, calculated "to inſtruct as well as amuſe," is ſo obvious that the proprietor conceives it unneceſſary to ſay much on the ſubject. To thoſe, who are prevented by circumſtances or ſituation from collecting a private Library, it affords an acceſs at a cheap rate to Books of merit, and as there is a diſtinction between Books to be PERUSED and Books to be POSSESSED, it affords an opportunity to Ladies and Gentlemen who have Libraries, of uſing the former without loading their ſhelves.---Reading may in every ſenſe be called a cheap amuſement, and the variety and durability of the pleaſure derived from BOOKS will ſtand in competition with any other;---a Circulating Library by contributing to the facility of their attainment may be accounted one of the firſt ſources of what the learned Dr. Aiken calls "cheap and procurable pleaſure."

THE POOR BLIND GIRL.

WRITTEN BY MR. C. L. PITT.

THOUGH tender and young, ſince my eye-ſight is gone,
(My parents I've loſt, to increaſe my ſad moan)
Barefooted, alas! through the ſtreets I muſt go,
To aſk a hard world ſome relief for my woe!
My ſtory would ſoften the heart of a churl;
O, pity! O, pity! a poor blind girl!

The pleaſures of ſummer you ſee, and enjoy,
For me want and blindneſs thoſe pleaſures deſtroy:
You've joys, too, in winter; but I, to my coſt,
Know winter, alone, by the ſmart of it's froſt!
My ſtory, &c.

I once knew, though blind I now wretchedly ſtray,
The comforts of wealth, and the bleſſing of day;
A parent's fond care then enlighten'd my mind;
Whence keener affliction, alas! I now find!
My ſtory, &c.

Then ſteel not your boſoms againſt my ſad tale---
Ah! look on my years-- it muſt ſurely prevail:
My tears kindly dry; and oh, may ye ne'er know,
The horrors of want, or the heart-ach of woe!
My ſtory, &c.
